(c) Yes Sir, the recommendations accepted by the Government were implemented.

(d) Yes Sir. An evaluation was made by the Core Group set up by the Department of Women and Child Development while drafting the National Perspective Plan for Women 1988—2000. The Core Group found that there have been certain positive development effecting women such as the expectation of life at birth had improved; the sex ratio had registered a slight rise; the mean age at marriage for girls had gone up to 18.3; the focus and programmes for women had shifted from welfare to development; several legislative enactments had come into force to protect the interests of women, etc. However, certain negative indicators continued such as the sex ratio was projected as continuing to be adverse upto 2000 AD; amniocentesis tests were being misused resulting in the female foetus being aborted; age specific death rates indicated higher rates for female children; 75 per cent of women were still illiterate; the work participation rate for females was not increasing; crimes against women continued in large numbers, etc. The National Perspective Plan has therefore made specific recommendations with reference to rural development in agriculture, employment and training, supportive services, education, health and family welfare, legislation, political particinaton and decision making, media and communications and voluntary action arriving at economic development and integration of women into the main stream of the economy and achieving equity and social justice for all women.
